Assuredly it seemed to me that all was over; and the future a dead blank. And for a time I was as a man stunned. But in truth it was very far otherwise! I was fifty-five; but I was in good health, young for my years, strong and vigorous in constitution, and before a year had passed it began to seem to me that a future, and life and its prospects, might open to me afresh; that the curtain might be dropped on the drama that was passed, and a new phase of life begun. I had had, and vividly enjoyed an entire life, according to the measure that is meted out to many, perhaps I may say to most men. But I felt myself ready for another! And--thanks this time also to a woman--I have had another, in no wise less happy, in some respects, as less chequered by sorrows--more happy than the first! I am in better health too, having outgrown apparently several of the maladies which young people are subject to! Of this second life I am not now going to tell my readers anything. What I remember of my first life may be, and I hope has been, told frankly without giving offence or annoyance to any human being. I don't know that the telling of the story of my second life would necessarily lead me to say anything which could hurt anybody. But mixed up as...
