Their justification, it is claimed, is in the training and not in the material product, though even it can be far from worthless. Further, it is said that wood and metal make lack of precision evident and that the work stands as its own judge. This is true in some degree of all work. If it is more true of wood than of the other materials under discussion, does it not then require less ability to judge on the part of the workman? If this is a fact, certainly it is an argument in favor of wood as a medium for as early a period as exact work is advisable. But even so it only emphasizes the necessity of subsequent work where the difference in quality of workmanship requires the exercise of greater discrimination. Does not work in wood...
