Not illustrated. 1887 Excerpt: . . . is stepping out of his legitimate field and assuming that for which he has in no degree qualified himself; on the other hand, when the physician adopts these compounds of the pharmacist and follows his suggestions in their use, he is not only sanctioning and encouraging these reprehensible products, but degrading himself to the level of a mere nurse. More than this, he is debasing the profession, so far as he can, to a position secondary and subservient to that of pharmacy, --making it a tool or convenience through which these remedies may be vended. Both these evils prevail extensively; and it is well that here and there throughout the county there are those who, seeing the tendency of these practices to undermine both the science and the art of medicine, and the inevitable ultimate reflex injury it will bring upon pharmacy proper, have raised their voices in condemnation of them. Fundamentally, these evils may be traced to two sources. The first is the fierce competition for business which has grown among pharmacists owing to the unnecessarily large number who have engaged in drug manufacture of late years. This has led them to depart in various ways from legitimate pharmacy, and to adopt a diversity of shifts and devices to keep afloat, and driven them to exercise their ingenuity to place on the market attractive medical novelties each with the hope of gaining some advantage over his competitors. As the result of this every mail crowds...
