On the morrow, New-year s Day, Miss St. Clair was persuaded to dine with the Stanhopes once more. As it was the commemoration of the Circumcision of Our Lord, there was Morning Service in the English Church; and there Miss Agatha was found in her accustomed seat, and with her usual surprises. At the conclusion of the Service, her Matins, she returned home with her young friends. The poor girl seemed very depressed, and did her utmost to give an artificial brightness to her countenance, and a cheeriness to her conversation: at last she admitted that the communication she received yesterday from the Mother Superior, and which Lilian had brought with her into Paris, had much saddened and disturbed her. Mr. Stanhope, said Agatha, on seeing him enter the room, I have been very much pained, and cannot easily recover from my vexation. The Mother Superior has written me word that a dispensation from fasting before receiving the Holy Eucharist is impossible. She tells me, the Church cannot grant it; and, therefore, I am forbidden to communicate to-morrow. To receive, not fasting, the Mother says, is a fearful sin. I shall, however, attend Matins, and remain during the celebration. You cannot imagine how deeply it grieves me. Miss St. Clair, the Church of England does not say this, I am convinced. You cannot point out to me any canon or rubric of our Church which commands this fasting...
