CALHOUN, JACKSON, AND NATIONAL GOVERNMENT. In 1811, John C. Calhoun of South Carolina, a young man not of the age of thirty years, took his seat as a member of the national House of Representatives, and at once became a leader in public affairs. He was one of the Committee on Foreign Relations. On the 12th of December he said what was the road the nation should tread to make it great and to produce in this country not the form but the real spirit of union. 1 In March, 1815, he voted for a high tariff and said: He believed the policy of the country required protection to our manufacturing establishments. a He also reported the bill to incorporate a United States Bank, and supported it in a speech on its constitutionality. Webster, on the contrary, opposed the tariff bills,...
